ROOSEVELT HOUSE HISTORY

Roosevelt House, a double townhouse located at 47-49 East 65th Street, was built in 1908 as a wedding gift from Sara Delano Roosevelt to her son, Franklin, and his new bride, Eleanor. At Roosevelt House, Franklin began his storied political career, rising from New York State Senator and Assistant Secretary of the Navy to Governor of New York and President of the United States.

The Roosevelts became actively involved with their neighbor, Hunter College. When in town Eleanor often walked over to visit with students and speak at special events. In 1940, President Roosevelt dedicated the new Hunter building on Park Avenue. When Sara died in 1941, the family put the combined house up for sale. A nonprofit consortium, organized on behalf of Hunter student groups, agreed to buy it for the college. President Roosevelt made the first contribution toward the purchase.

In November 1943, Eleanor attended the dedication of the house, honoring Sara Delano Roosevelt’s commitment to interfaith and interracial understanding. Roosevelt House flourished as a vibrant center of student life for nearly 50 years. The building became a city landmark in 1973, and joined the National Register of Historic Places in 1980.

ROOSEVELT HOUSE TODAY

Under the leadership of Hunter President Jennifer J. Raab and with a stunning interior design by noted architect James Polshek (Ennead Architects), Roosevelt House has undergone a complete restoration and is now the home of the Roosevelt House Public Policy Institute at Hunter College, and a state-of-the-art facility offering a prime venue for lectures, conferences, special events, film and television, product launches, film screenings and social events.

The dramatic auditorium, carved out of the lower levels of the building is ideal for lectures, conferences, and other programs. The elegant and distinguished former reception areas and dining rooms on the first floor are also available for a variety of intimate affairs, including weddings, business gatherings, and high-profile corporate and social functions.
